

I am in full support of Sinclairs decision to air the John Kerry documentary. There is certainly a clear argument to be made that on any given night information given on the evening news is biased to one candidate. Yet Sinclair would have every right to require that its affiliates air the evening news. One could argue the moral merits and accuracy of this documentary in the same way as was done to Fahrenheit 9/11 or to Dan Rather's story on the President's military record. These clearly favored one candidate over another. However one cannot objectively argue against the right for any of these to be played on public airways. To do so would be to allow a non elected government body to determine what is true and factual and what is opinion or propaganda on behalf of the public. That determination should be made in either the court of public opinion or a court of law.
